"Amid all the reports of civil unrest in South Vietnam, CIA Director John McCone closeted himself with the Senate Foreign Relations Committee for a two-hour closed door session today.

"Though committee members were close-mouthed about the subject covered, there was little doubt that a great deal was said about South Vietnam. Questioned by newsmen after the briefing, Committee Chairman J. William Fulbright described the recent outbreaks of violence as distressing. He said the United States could do little at this time to alleviate it. There were growing indications, however, that the administration had better start trying."
